Summary

The American Scholar is a lecture that Ralph Waldo Emerson gave to a select audience at Harvard College in which he expresses his sentiments about the American intelligentsia. The central theme of Emerson's essay is the need to establish a unique American intelligentsia free of any European links.

Emerson tells his audience to draw inspiration from local sources to create a truly American culture. He cites an American fable that traces the origins of society to 'one man' who gave rise to many people to expand the workforce. However, the continued social division has resulted in degeneration of the society and its people, including the scholar who is now a 'mere thinker', not a 'thinking man'.

Nature shapes human thoughts and actions and thus, helps people to develop productive insights and live a better life. Emerson attributes the failure to find solutions to human problems to our clinging to old-fashioned ideas. A true scholar must free himself from olden ways of thinking that have reduced society's efficiency.

Emerson believes that age-old ideas contained in books are to blame for the lost efficiency in society. In his view, though the ideas hamper freedom of thought, no one is willing to criticize them. Emerson believes that the information contained in books pose a danger to man's creativity and initiative.

Books influence human thinking, but their ideas are biased because they based on past standards. Emerson notes that the influence of books is what kills human creative genius and inspiration. In his view, a scholar should use books as a source of
