Lapland in Finland is one of the best places to observe aurorae as it has good accessibility high quality accommodation and inland Finland has relatively clear skies compared e g to coastal Norway However seeing them requires some planning and some luck To have a good chance to see them you should stay at least a few days preferably a week or more in the far north in the right season In the south northern lights are seldom seen In e g Helsinki there are northern lights about once a month but you are likely to be somewhere with too much light pollution In the winter in northern Lapland on the other hand the probability of some northern lights is 50 70 % every night with clear skies and light pollution is quite easy to avoid there
