The Application of Ultrasonic Energy in the Deformation of Metals Alan R. Rosenfield, 1963 On June 21 a symposium was sponsored by the Bureau of Naval Weapons on the application of ultrasonic energy in the deformation of metals At this session a number of investigators actively working in the field reported informally on the results of their research The reports revealed that the results achieved by incorporating ultrasonic transducers into conventional metalforming and cutting operations are sufficiently promising that the technique merits further attention Data are available to indicate that application of ultrasonic vibrations during metal working can increase speeds lower forces and improve surface finishes All of these results have been obtained without any observed difference in properties between ultrasonically and conventionally fabricated parts Author Subject Catalog Library of Congress, 1981
