

Thought Transference
(or What?) in Birds

by

Edmund Selous

author of

"Realities of Bird Life" etc.

In the following pages the author endeavours to show, by the publication of his careful records of bird-watching, that thought-transference exists in nature, independently of man. The evidence is the more valuable because it is presented in a résumé of facts observed and noted down on the spot, when possible, and when not, whilst still fresh in his memory. The author's arguments upon the evidence are also given as they arose in his mind at the time, or were afterwards elaborated. The gist of the matter is that if birds, when together, act in the same way simultaneously, they must do so either in response to some extraneous event which affects them through the senses, as known to us, at one and the same time, or because influenced in some other way than this, known or unknown, or by coincidence merely. Mr. Selous concludes after a careful survey of all the factors in the case, that thought-transference in birds is, at least potentially constant and therefore normal. That however should be only the starting-point for further unblushing research.
