

Experiment 1: Venturi Flow

The Venturi tube is a device used to measure the flow rate of a fluid. It consists of a tube with a varying cross-section. The fluid flows from the wider section to the narrower section, and the pressure difference between the two sections is used to determine the flow rate.

In the experiment, water is used as the fluid. The water flows from the wider section to the narrower section, and the pressure difference between the two sections is used to determine the flow rate.

It is important to note that the flow rate is not constant throughout the tube. The flow rate is highest in the narrower section and lowest in the wider section.

The experiment is designed to measure the flow rate of water through a Venturi tube. The results of the experiment will be compared to the theoretical results.

Experimental Theory

Figure 1 shows the setup for the experiment. The water flows from the wider section to the narrower section, and the pressure difference between the two sections is used to determine the flow rate. The flow rate is highest in the narrower section and lowest in the wider section.
