

pensions and conditions apparent at end of the nineteenth century in the Metropolitan Police.

- to establish a police union in 1890 didn't succeed, received some support and coverage in the journal for police officers, the Police Review
- The development of a trade press for the police helped develop a national awareness among officers (Rawlings 2003).
- illustrated in the strike by the Metropolitan and City of London Police forces in 1918 following the dismissal of an officer for his 'union activities'.
- Desborough Committee, established by the government after the strike to look into police pay and conditions, recommended standardization across the country as well as better pay for the police.

Policing since the Second World War

Although there is a danger of generalizing, the British police were, on the whole, respected and reasonable well regarded by the early years, and through the first half of the twentieth century.

- positive view changed in the latter decades of the last century.
- A brief review of some of the background and historical factors that have played a part in the changes of attitudes to, and styles of, policing from the 1960s will help to establish a context from which to consider contemporary policing.
- Will group them under the following headings:
- changes in police organization and practice;
- police-public relations;
- general social changes.

changes Police organisation and practice

A new technology of policing, extolled in particular by Harold Wilson's Labour government of the 1960s, was embraced with enthusiasm by the police and Home Office.

New technology was a key factor in the development of the Unit Beat System of policing.

This developed out of experiments in the Lancashire constabulary to cope with the large new town of Kirby on the outskirts of Liverpool.

The use of special patrol cars (rather than 'bobbies on the beat') had begun in 1958

By 1968 the Unit Beat System covered two thirds of the population in England and Wales - these developments distanced the police from the public they were policing, with police officers in cars less approachable than the police officer on a foot patrol.

- During the 1960s public attitudes to the police became characterized by a growing dissatisfaction with and concern over police behaviour.
- This was fuelled by the policing of public mass demonstrations such as CND marches and, later in the 1960s, rallies and demonstrations over the Vietnam war and apartheid.
