towns and cities and particularly in London is seen as flawed The single most important reason why the disorder spread was the perception relayed by television as well as social media that in some areas the police had lost control of the streets The death of Mark Duggan was a significant factor in the disorder that took place in Tottenham A potentially tense situation was made worse by failures of communication on the part of the Metropolitan Police and the Independent Police Complaints Commission Those who took part in the disorder did use social media to communicate with each other but television also played a part in spreading the disorder All police forces should have a communication strategy in place so in the event of a credible threat of severe public disorder all businesses in the affected area are given early and consistent advice about what action they should take
