the First World War organized international cooperation assumed greater importance and the need was recognized of giving to the instruments of such cooperation legal status and rights which would facilitate the effective performance of their functions. This proved to be a difficult adjustment for legal theory to make since the enjoyment of special privileges and immunities had been based in traditional international law on the fiction of state sovereignty. The new international organizations while performing functions of the kind performed by national governments were far from possessing the powers of such governments. The failure of the League of Nations to achieve its major purpose did not signify any permanent decline in the role of organized international cooperation.
