

experience as a basis for planning and taking an appropriate action. The same authors also insist that for an individual to qualify as a reflective teacher there is a need to go beyond the prime concern where teaching techniques are geared towards understanding "how to" to a new dimension. This is where an individual teacher asks the question of "why" and "what". This approach is highlighted to be part of the broader purpose of education.

Pollard and Collins (2005) also posit that the question of "why and what" provides an individual with a certain power beyond the obvious teaching. This is based on the fact that the responsibility and autonomy degree is determined by the control level that teachers are able to exercise over their actions. Therefore, as a result of reflecting on the questions of "why and what", teachers are able to fully gain control in addition to opening up to the possibility of having the everyday life transformed in the classroom.

Framing reflective teaching

For an individual to undergo a development process to a reflective thinker, Valli and Buese (2007) advise on employment of various approaches. These approaches are inclusive of critically observing the others as well as one self, team teaching, and exploration of an individual's teaching approach through writing. In any approach, Valli and Buese (2007) insist on a process that is divided into three parts. The first part is the event itself. This step is perceived as critical at the onset of any episode that will incorporate actual teaching. While the critical reflection is usually targeted at developing the individual teaching approach of a teacher, there is a possibility of self reflection being stimulated by observing the teaching of another person.
