

PASSIVE AUDIENCE MODELS

This assumes that media audiences are passive and mindlessly consume and accept media.

ACTIVE AUDIENCE MODELS

This assumes that media audiences actively interpret or criticise media images, give them different meanings and interpretations from that intended, or simply ignore or reject them together.

THE HYPODERMIC SYRINGE MODEL - PASSIVE AUDIENCES

This suggests that the media acts like a syringe injecting media texts into audiences. Audiences are seen as unthinking, passive receivers of media texts - they are unable to resist messages injected into them. This is also sometimes referred to as 'spoon-feeding'. Audiences are filled with the dominant ideology, sexist, racist stereotypical images and they immediately act on these messages. For instance, if you watch something violent you may go and do something violent.

The Hypodermic Syringe Model has been behind many moral panics over the effects of media on behaviour, for example, the effects of gaming and aggression.

EVALUATION

The Hypodermic Syringe Model assumes that the entire audience is homogeneous (sharing the same characteristics) and will react the same way to media content. It also assumes that the media has enormous power and influence, overriding all other agencies of socialisation and people's experiences. There is also little evidence that media content has an immediate effect on audiences.

THE TWO-STEP FLOW MODEL - ACTIVE AUDIENCES

Katz and Lazarsfeld (1955) said that a key factor affecting audience responses is the influence of opinion leaders in social networks to which people belong. Opinion leaders (for example, celebrities, politicians and influencers) are those respected members of any group who select, interpret and filter media (for 1st step) and then lead opinion about them in their social groups and whom others listen to and take notice of (2nd step). Audiences are not directly affected by the media but are influenced by manipulated or altered and interpreted messages received from opinion leaders.

EVALUATION

Media content can be selected and interpreted by many different individuals in different groups, for instance, parents (as opinion leaders) may have one view, an opinion-leading workmate another view and a teacher another. Ideas and interpretations of media content gets bounced around for discussions in a variety of groups, creating many steps in the flow of media influence. The rise of new media diminishes the roles of the traditional view of opinion leaders as people receive a diversity of messages through the use of social media.

THE USE OF GRATIFICATIONS MODEL - ACTIVE AUDIENCE

This assumes media has the weakest effect and that the audience is the most active. McQuail (1972) and Lull (1995) argue that the media audience are active and creative human beings, who use media in various ways for their own various pleasures and interests (gratifications).

- Diversion - leisure, entertainment and relaxation to escape daily routines
- Personal relationships - keeping up with family and friends, meeting people for example via social media
- Personal identity - keeping up with interests that might affect them to find out about the world, for example, keeping up to date with current affairs through accessing news via social media or news print.

THE CULTURAL EFFECTS MODELS (CEM) - THE 'DRIP-DRIP' EFFECT - ACTIVE AUDIENCES

The Neo-Marxist CEM suggests that media content is formed and spread by the dominant ideology in society. Audiences interpret the message they consume and may respond in different ways depending on their social characteristics (CAGED) and their own experiences. Those without their experiences to draw on to make judgements are more likely to accept what the media tells them. The media gradually influences the audience over time, gradually shaping peoples' ideas and assumptions to match the dominant ideology.

RECEPTION ANALYSIS MODEL - HALL

THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE MEDIA AND AUDIENCES

Hall said that audiences will interpret content presented by the media differently. The media can be decoded or interpreted in one of three ways:

- The preferred dominant reading - acceptance of the dominant viewpoint (as suggested by the CEM)
- A negotiated reading - the dominant view is accepted, but amended to fit audiences' own beliefs and experiences
- An oppositional reading - outright rejection of preferred or dominant interpretation of media content

The dominant view is creating a moral panic.

SELECTIVE FILTERING - KLAPPER

Suggests that people actively engage with media content and that there are 3 filters that people apply in interpreting the content.

- Selective exposure - choose to access media content that fits in with their existing views and interests
- Selective perception - they will interpret the message in accordance with whether or not it fits with their own views
- Selective retention - they will only remember media messages that support their beliefs

EVALUATION

Greg Philo and the Glasgow Media Group are critical of the cultural effects approaches - they argue that these models exaggerate the extent to which audiences can give whatever interpretations they choose to engage with media content. Most people accept the domestic media unless they have access to alternative forms of information. Some people do not (especially the older generation) and rely on very traditional news sources to form beliefs and understanding.

It assumes that media personnel (journalists) work within a framework of the dominant ideology and that it does not recognise that journalists have some independence (investigative journalism) in their work. They can sometimes be very critical of the dominant view.
