importance for the archaeology and history of Burkina Faso Complete storage jars metal equipment wooden furniture rope and textile fragments grinding stones and charred botanical remains are only a fraction of the total assemblage of finds Although we are dealing with the results of a single occupation phase and from one building only the density of finds the preservation of the architecture and the absence of later disturbances add considerably to our understanding of daily life in this part of West Africa Up to now the limited contextual information about life in villages and towns prior to the historical periods has promoted divergent and weakly argued interpretations This volume breaks open new grounds of investigation and calls for further study Additionally the editors hope that this report will stimulate and encourage the discussion between historians and archaeologists of the fascinating West African past The current volume presents an introduction to the expedition an analysis of the site formation processes the presentation of the architectural features in depth studies of the findings and a lively account of the heritage management project that resulted in an on site museum Nine authors contributed to this rich and multifaceted final report The account of the construction intensive use violent destruction and subsequent rediscovery of the building is the enthralling subject of this volume which is richly illustrated with numerous coloured drawings photographs maps and reconstruction drawings It melds archaeological historical and environmental data into a thrilling story A story that reads like a new Crime Scene Investigation episode but happens to have been a real life tragedy in the African Sahel almost 1 000 years ago Research Paper FPL ,1983 Directory of Metalworking Machinery.
