

THE ALL-PURPOSE SCIENCE TEACHER: AN ANALYSIS OF LOOPHOLES IN STATE REQUIREMENTS FOR HIGH SCHOOL SCIENCE TEACHERS

The basic story line of the STEM (Science, Technology, Engineering and Mathematics) crisis is, at this point, well known. In an increasingly interdependent and technology-driven economy, America is falling behind. A substantial number of students cannot perform basic math. U.S. students lag behind peers in international comparisons of science and math knowledge and skills. Fewer American students than ever are graduating from college with math and science degrees, and there is a shortage of K-12 teachers in STEM fields.

In this paper, the National Council on Teacher Quality (NCTQ) shows that the problem is deeper still. The U.S. suffers not only because of the math and science teachers we don't have – in many cases we also set unacceptably low expectations for the STEM teachers we do have.

Based on their high school science licensure requirements, many states seem to presume that it is all the same to teach anatomy, electrical currents and Newtonian physics. NCTQ's analysis of state policies regarding these requirements finds that many states fail to guarantee that biology, chemistry and physics teachers have mastered the content they teach. Most states cling to a loose definition of "science teacher" – ultimately treating specialized science teachers as interchangeable.

We aren't arguing that it is impossible for a talented teacher to be proficient in all scientific subjects. And we certainly aren't arguing that more paper credentials are the needed fix. If teachers were truly evaluated based on their effectiveness, how they acquired their subject-matter knowledge would be irrelevant. No matter what their majors or paths into teaching, if teachers were required to pass rigorous tests of content knowledge in the specific fields of science they are tasked to teach, there might not be reason for alarm. But more often than not, this is not what happens and not what states require.

As a result, it is necessary to examine preparation and credentialing requirements, which, as we show, include some pretty big loopholes for secondary science educators. NCTQ finds, in fact, that all but 11 states allow secondary science teachers to obtain general-science certifications or combination licenses across multiple science disciplines. In most cases, these teachers need only pass a general-knowledge science exam that does not ensure subject-specific content knowledge.

An Empty Curriculum Sandra Stotsky, 2015-02-19 Teachers cannot teach what they do not know This country has tolerated a weak licensing system for prospective teachers for decades This weak system has been accompanied by an increasingly emptier curriculum for most students depriving them of the knowledge and skills needed for self government An Empty Curriculum How Teacher Licensure Tests Lead to Empty Student Minds makes the case that the complete revision of the licensing system for prospective and veteran teachers in Massachusetts in 2000 and the construction of new or more demanding teacher licensing tests contributed significantly to the Massachusetts education miracle That miracle consisted of enduring gains in achievement for students in all demographic groups and in all regional vocational technical high schools since 2005 gains confirmed by tests independent of Massachusetts policy makers The immediate purpose of this book is to explain what Massachusetts did in 2000 to strengthen its teacher licensing and re licensing system to ensure that all teachers could teach to relatively strong K 12 standards Its larger purpose is to suggest that development of strong academic standards in all major subjects should be followed by complete revision of a state s teacher licensing system not as has been the case for several decades the development of K 12 student tests if this country wants to strengthen public education
