Preeclampsia in Pregnancy of African American Women 35 Years And Above
Preeclampsia is a medical condition which has adverse effects on prenatal as well as maternal health particularly in settings of middle and low income. It is a noteworthy risk factor for prenatal death, low birth weight, preterm birth, and maternal mortality. It accounts for a large portion of the one million maternal deaths in middle- and low-income backgrounds. It also accounts for significant percentages of the twenty million low birth weight newborns, eight million preterm births, and six million prenatal deaths in middle and low-income settings. According to "thebmj", an analysis of ages periods cohorts indicate a strong age effects of women at maternal ages to have more risks of preeclampsia than young women below 35 years (Ananth, Keyes & Wapner, 2017). They are more prone to it as they are twice likely to be overweight, go through heart disease, or develop lupus, hepatitis C or as well as diabetes. These African-American women are more likely to suffer from cancer, asthma, arthritis or Chlamydia as well.

Project Description

The neonatal mortality and maternal rates are always high in the women of African origin residing in United States of America. According to a research in "thebmj" article, cases of severe preeclampsia have greatly increased in USA considering the age cohorts reflecting the relative number of deaths (Ananth, Keyes & Wapner, 2017). The two major causes of these deaths are obstructed labor and preeclampsia. This particular project tries to question whether indigenous women from African-American origin and those who have African ancestry are more prone to this disease or not. In previous studies it has been found that part of susceptibility is irrelevant of the socio-economic status and is more likely to have genetic or biological factors involved.
