

Assignment 2: Writing A Research Prospectus

This class has presented statistical evidence that documents group differences in college attendance rates. Explanations for these differences in educational achievement, however, are still debated. This research project invites you to enter this debate. Imagine that you will spend the next year inside one of Oakland's public high schools in search of answers to the following question: why are some groups of people more likely to succeed or fail in high school than others?

You will select a focus for your approach to this question and present your analysis of the problem in the form of a research prospectus. Sociologists and other scholars write a prospectus when they are preparing to undertake a new research project. The prospectus identifies a research question, summarizes the relevant scholarly literature on the major issues in the field, and offers an initial hypothesis that will be explored in the subsequent research.

A research prospectus is broken into several steps (explained below). Some of the basic research for this paper will be conducted as part of a small team (hopefully, you will already have formed your research team of three to four people). You and your research team will be given handouts containing basic data about your high school and its surrounding community. You and your team will review the data I have provided and determine a primary focus for your research (class inequality, racial inequality, gender inequality, sexual inequality).

Using the course reading assignments as your foundation, you will supplement these readings with information from at least two relevant articles that you find through the library's electronic data bases of scholarly articles. I encourage you to use your team as a brainstorming group (i.e., you should discuss potential interpretations of the data, identify additional information that you would like to discover and develop arguments that would help you explain the data). You will also use your team as peer editors of your work in progress. Your research papers, however, must be written on your own and reflect your unique voice. All quotes must be properly cited and you should attach a Works Cited page at the end of your research prospectus. See the ASA Style Guide handout on the course website for information on how to cite your sources.

The final paper should be between 2700 and 3000 words or about 9 to 10 typed and double-spaced pages. Your word count should be posted in the top left corner of the first page of your essay. The preliminary drafts of your paper are due in class on November 17th. The graduate student readers assigned to this class will read and comment on your drafts. You will then revise your work and turn in your final project in class on December 8th. Please staple your original draft with comments from the reader to your final draft.
