SHORT-ANSWER QUESTIONS

 1-1 Management accounting measures, analyzes, and reports financial and nonfinancial information to internal managers making internal decisions to improve performance. The reporting and analyses are not restricted by generally accepted accounting principles (GAAP) based on either International Financial Reporting Standards (IFRS) or Canadian accounting standards.

Financial accounting measures, analyzes, and reports primarily financial information to external parties who own the corporate assets, such as investors, government agencies, and banks. Methods of identification and classification of business transactions, measurement of their economic effect, analyses, and reporting in financial statements must comply with standards set by the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants (CICA). The CICA participates in the production of IFRS and has the option to amend rather than adopt these standards.

Other differences include (1) management accounting emphasizes the future (not the past), and (2) management accounting is designed specifically to influence the behaviour of managers and other employees (rather than primarily reporting economic events).

 1-2 In Canada, financial accounting is constrained by GAAP. Companies listed on stock exchanges must comply with IFRS. Other companies must comply with CICA standards when reporting to external parties. Management accounting is not restricted to these principles. The result is:

- management accountants can charge interest on owners' capital to help judge a division's performance, even though such a charge is not allowed under GAAP
- management accountants can classify, measure, and include the value of internally developed assets and liabilities not recognized under GAAP
- management accountants can use measurement methods of the value of assets or liabilities not permitted under GAAP
- management accountants can change the method of revenue and expense recognition, which is not permitted under GAAP, and
- management accountants assess the quality of information provided based on how well it reflects the economic reality of a real business process, not a standard.
