THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN GEORGE AND LENNIE

In the novella 'Of Mice and Men' Steinbeck depicts the friendship of two migrant agricultural labourers George Milton and Lennie Small. They are travelling to a ranch outside Soledad where they hope to secure work. George and Lennie are the complete antithesis of each other which immediately raises questions in the minds of the reader as to why they are travelling together. Soledad means lonely and this makes the reader wonder whether this unusual friendship is a means of evading loneliness. George is described as "Small and quick, dark of face, with restless eyes and sharp, strong features", whilst Lennie is "dragging his feet a little, the way a bear drags his paws". It was very unusual in 1930s America for a typical ranch worker to have a companionship due to the loneliness of migrant life. Some of the men on the ranch are suspicious of their closeness; the boss asks "what stake you got in this guy?" and suggests that George was stealing Lennie's "pay". Even Slim comments to George "Funny how you an' him string along together"

The only other friendship bond in the novella is that of Candy and his "drag footed sheep dog" which can be seen as mirroring the friendship of Lennie and George. When the old and infirm dog is shot, Slim perceptively says "that dog ain't no good to himself" which foreshadows the death of Lennie as we know that Lennie cannot control his physical strength and therefore was a danger to himself and to others.

George serves as a father figure to Lennie as his puerile nature meant that he could not look after himself; "You never ought to drink water that ain't running, Lennie" and we as readers see the dependency that Lennie has on George to protect him from danger. Beneath the surface of their relationship, there is a co-dependency. Caring for Lennie gives George a sense of responsibility and purpose. Ranch hands during the 1930s were characterised by loneliness and powerlessness and Lennie offers George a sense of status as his guardian. Instead of being a solitary ranch worker, he has "someone to talk to that gives a damn ". George frequently reminds Lennie that without him he could "live so easy and maybe have a girl"; such protestations can be seen as George masking his own need for this companionship. A father and son role is formed between them "Look, George, look what I done". Due to Lennie's disability, if George were not present to assist and protect him, Lennie would have been placed in the "booby-hatch". There was no welfare-state at the time and psychiatric institutions were very cruel to their patients. Lennie would have been abused and unfairly treated. George also prevents any potential prejudice towards Lennie by telling the other ranch workers that he had an "accident" as a child. He does admit that he used to abuse his power against Lennie to make him look "goddamn smart beside him" but has learnt from his actions and does "nothing like that no more".
