It has been noted in many papers that the two-dimensional, steady-state, laminar flow of a fluid over a flat plate is characterized by a boundary layer that develops from the leading edge of the plate. The boundary layer is defined as the region in which the velocity of the fluid is significantly different from the free-stream velocity. The boundary layer is characterized by a velocity profile that is parabolic at the leading edge and becomes more and more flattened as the distance from the leading edge increases. The boundary layer is also characterized by a velocity profile that is parabolic at the leading edge and becomes more and more flattened as the distance from the leading edge increases.
