bringing together science history urban design and social justice to change the way we think about a critical natural resource that should be available to all On a 90 degree day in Los Angeles bus riders across the city line up behind the shadows cast by street signs and telephone poles looking for a little relief from the sun's glaring heat Every summer such scenes play out in cities across the United States and as Sam Bloch argues we ignore the benefits of shade at our own peril Heatwaves are now the country's deadliest natural disasters with victims concentrated in poorer less shady areas Public health mental health and crime statistics are worse in neighborhoods without it For some finding shade is a matter of life and death Shade was once a staple of human civilization In Mesopotamia and Northern Africa cities were built densely so that courtyards and public passageways were in shadow in the heat of the day with cool breezes flowing freely The Greeks famously philosophized in shady agoras Even today in Spain's sunny Seville political careers are imperiled when leaders fail to put out the public shades that hang above sidewalks in time for summer heat So what happened in the U S The arrival of air conditioning and the dominance of cars took away the impetus to enshrine shade into our rapidly growing cities Though a few heroic planners engineers and architects developed shady designs for efficiency and comfort the removal of shade trees in favor of wider roads and underinvestment in public spaces created a society where citizens retreat to their own cooled spaces if they can increasingly taxing the energy grid or face dangerous heat outdoors Shade examines the key role that shade plays not only in protecting human health and enhancing urban life but also looks toward the ways that innovative architects city leaders and climate entrepreneurs are looking to revive it to protect vulnerable people and maybe even save the planet Ambitious and far reaching Shade helps us see a crucially important subject in a new light

Creating "Greater Malaysia" Tai Yong Tan, 2008 Malaysia came into existence on 9 16 63 as a federation of Malaya Singapore Sabah North Borneo and Sarawak in 1965 Singapore withdrew from the federation Offers an in depth and detailed analysis of the political processes that led to formation of the Federation of Malaysia in 1963 It argues that the Malaysia that came into being following the amalgamation of Malaya Singapore Sarawak and North Borneo was a political creation whose only rationale was that it served a convergence of political and economic expediency for the departing colonial power the Malayan leadership and the ruling party of self governing Singapore Greater Malaysia was thus an artificial political entity the outcome of a concatenation of interests and motives of a number of political actors in London and Southeast Asia from the 1950s to the early 1960s This led to a number of unresolved compromises between Singapore and Kuala Lumpur and did not obviate the possibility of future difficulties and the seeds of dissension sown by the disagreements between the two governments were to sprout into major crises during Singapore's brief history in the Federation of Malaysia
