DNA REPLICATION

Name: _____

What happens to the DNA double helix?

During copying, the DNA double helix must be unwound. This is done by an enzyme called helicase. Helicase breaks the hydrogen bonds between the base pairs, causing the DNA to unwind. This creates a replication fork. The two strands of the original DNA are called parental strands. The new strands being synthesized are called daughter strands. The process of DNA replication is called semiconservative replication.

The Synthesis of DNA - A Semi-Conservative Process

Helicase and topoisomerase (which relieves the tension in the DNA) create a replication fork. At each end of the fork, an enzyme called primase synthesizes a short RNA sequence called a primer. The DNA polymerase enzyme then adds nucleotides to the 3' end of the primer, creating a new DNA strand. The new strand is synthesized in the opposite direction to the parental strand, creating a discontinuous strand. The two new DNA molecules are called daughter molecules.

Termination of DNA Replication

Replication is complete when the two new DNA molecules are synthesized. The two daughter molecules are identical to the parent molecule. The process of DNA replication is called semiconservative replication.

The Replication Fork

The replication fork is the point where the two new DNA molecules are synthesized. The two daughter molecules are identical to the parent molecule. The process of DNA replication is called semiconservative replication.
