EXTERNAL FEATURES

TOAD

- The skin of the cane toad is rough, dry and warty. Cane Toads may be grey, yellowish, olive-brown or reddish-brown, and their bellies are pale with dark mottling. Average-sized adults are 10-15 cm long.
- Like all amphibians, toads breathe through their skin as well as with their lungs. When a toad is inactive the skin usually absorbs enough oxygen to meet its needs.
- Hind feet are leathery and slightly webbed
- Parotoid (suprascapular) gland. The parotoid gland is an external skin gland on toads. When the toad is threatened, its glands secrete a milky-white fluid known as bufotoxin. Components of bufotoxin are toxic to many animals.
- The tympanum (ear cavity or ear drum) is an external hearing structure in animals such as mammals, birds, some reptiles, some amphibians and some insects. In toads and frogs, the tympanum is a large external oval shape membrane made up of non-glandular skin which is located just behind the eye. It does not process sound waves; it simply transmits them to the inner parts of the amphibian's ear which is protected from the entry of water and other foreign objects.
- Nares (nostrils) under eyes but also breathe through skin
- Toads swallow their food whole and have no way to chew their food as they don't have any teeth.
- Toad's tongues are attached to the front of their mouths rather than at the back like humans. When a toad catches an insect it throws its sticky tongue out of its mouth and wraps it around its prey. The toad's tongue then snaps back and throws the food down its throat.
- The front feet have no webbing and are relatively small in size. During the breeding season, males of some species of frogs and toads develop lumps on their fingers called nuptial pads which help them cling to the females during mating.
