The Wolseley Viper was a British aircraft engine of WW1 developed from the successful design of the Hispano-Suiza 8V. The engineers of Wolseley Motors Company responded to a request for a lighter but more powerful engine to replace the Hispano 8. As a result they experimented with the new horizontally water-cooled engines of the time. The Wolseley Viper (officially 3 cylinder) was the product of the Hispano 8V. It sports a flat higher compression, greater power and was built from reliable materials. At a time when the Hispano 8V was considered a required feature for flight the Wolseley Viper was produced in several quantities being 1500 units.
