Abstract

This study tries to answer whether value based measures are superior to traditional accounting measures in explaining stock returns. A pooling panel data method on 115 Iranian listed companies in the Tehran Stock Exchange (TSE) from 2001 to 2008 is used to investigate the explanatory power of four value-based measures (including Economic Value Added, Refined Economic Value Added, Market Value Added and Shareholder Value Added) compare to five accounting-based measures (including Earning Per Share, Return On Equity, Return On Assets, Cash Flow from Operations and Return On Sales) in explaining stock returns. Our findings do not provide evidence which support assertions that value-based measures are superior compared with other traditional accounting measures. Relative information content tests revealed that stock returns are more closely associated with ROA and ROE than other performance measures. Furthermore, incremental information content tests suggest that value-based measures add only marginally information content beyond accounting measures. However, the results indicate that accounting measures generally dominate value-based measures.

1. Introduction

After Rappaport's publication of "Creating Shareholder Value" in 1986, it is widely believed that the primary aim of every business entity is to maximize shareholders wealth using efficient allocation of resources (Rappaport, 1998; Worthington and West, 2001, 2004; Maditions et al., 2006, 2009). Therefore, all of the firm activities must be directed to achieve this objective.

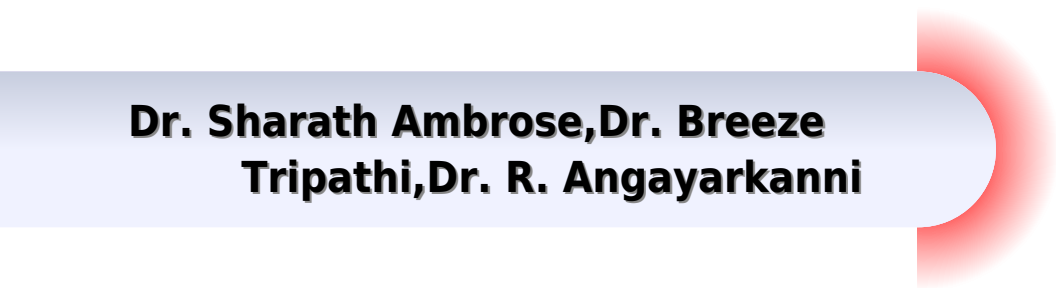

Since the 1900s, shareholders to induce managements to adopt a shareholder orientation; lenders to determine the security of their loans; managers to monitor the profitability of the firms and also to make strategic decisions have used traditional accounting-based measures including return on assets (ROA), return on equity (ROE), earning per share (EPS), return on sales (ROS) and cash flow from operations (CFO) (Worthington and West, 2001, 2004).

During the 1980s, the capital markets became more internationalized (Tortella and Brusco, 2003; Maditions et al., 2009) and there was a lot of competition between American and Japanese firms in that time. In addition, it became clear that managers can manipulate accounting earnings to show that their firms have a good performance (Jensen and Murphy, 1990; Tortella and Brusco, 2003). Moreover, investors interested to know all financial information on a firm (Maditions et al., 2009). Therefore, accounting-based measures came under attack and the need for new performance indicators increased.

Since the 1990s, several scholars and consulting firms have suggested new performance measures namely value-based measures, and also argued that these new measures are better than traditional measures for monitoring the real performance of the firms. For example, Shareholder Value Added (SVA) developed by Rappaport and LEK/Alcar Consulting Group (Rappaport, 1986, 1998), Economic Value Added (EVA[®]) and Market Value Added
