Maximum-Minimum (Low) Self-Registering Thermometer

Features of Construction

Glass bulb, at left behind bulb guard, is filled with a liquid which expands or contracts with increase or decrease of temperature. Connecting U-tube (1) contains the mercury column and part of the expanding liquid, while the expansion chamber, at right behind bulb guard, takes care of the increase and decrease of volume caused by the expansion and contraction of the liquid in the bulb and U-tube (1).

In the left-hand bore of the U-tube (1) is the minimum index (2), while in the right-hand bore is the maximum index (3).

To read temperature registered by either index, refer to bottom of edge of index.

To read temperature as indicated by either mercury column, refer to the meniscus, or top of column.

How it Operates

Observe left scale for low temperature reading and right scale for high temperature reading.

As temperature surrounding the glass bulb, behind bulb guard, increases, the liquid therein expands, forcing the mercury column down on the left side of the U-tube (1), and up on the right side of the tube, carrying with it the maximum index (3). As the temperature surrounding the bulb decreases, the liquid therein contracts, causing the mercury column on the left side of the U-tube to rise, carrying with it the minimum index (2). The maximum index (3) remains at the highest graduation indicated during a temperature increase, while the minimum index (2) remains at the lowest graduation indicated during a temperature decrease.

Resetting the Indices

To reset, place the ceramic magnet (4) across the U-tube (1) in horizontal position as illustrated, and draw downward slowly until the indices come to rest gently on the tops of the mercury columns.

Magnet

The special ceramic magnet (4) supplied with the Thermometer is kept in the pocket provided (5).

To Unite Mercury Columns

Shipping or severe vibration may cause separations in the mercury column on either side of the thermometer. Air bubbles may be formed in the heat side of the thermometer. These can usually be readily corrected by the following:

1. Grasping the thermometer at the top, give several downward swings, at a moderate force, until the mercury column is united on both sides. Excessive force in the downward swing may displace the mercury in the bore, causing inaccurate readings.
2. While the procedure in step one may eliminate some of the air bubbles, it is usually necessary to immerse the thermometer completely at about 130°F. This causes the column to expand upward on the heat side, driving the air bubbles into the tip. It is not recommended that the thermometer be completely immersed above 135°F. If this is insufficient to remove the air, a higher temperature may be used, if extreme care is exercised, by immersing only the top, including the bulb and tip, and watching to see that the tip does not fall closer than 3/16" from the top.

To Release Indices

If either index settles into its mercury column, follow the above instructions. After the first few swings, use the magnet to draw the index out of the mercury. If index (3) has been forced into the expansion chamber, at right behind bulb guard, manipulate it by tapping gently and using the magnet to return it to the bore of the tube.

Important: When reshipping, pack very carefully with thermometer bulbs at top of carton. Plainly mark carton to indicate top of instrument. Mark package: FRAGILE—HANDLE WITH CARE! Ship by Express if possible.
