Introduction

The purpose of this study was to investigate the effect of a 12-week resistance training program on the muscle strength and endurance of young adults. The study was conducted in a laboratory setting and involved 20 participants who were randomly assigned to either a control group or an experimental group. The experimental group performed a resistance training program consisting of three sessions per week, while the control group did not perform any exercise. The study was approved by the local ethics committee and all participants gave their informed consent.

Methods

The participants were screened for any contraindications to exercise and were then divided into two groups: a control group (n=10) and an experimental group (n=10). The experimental group performed a resistance training program consisting of three sessions per week for 12 weeks. The program included exercises for the upper and lower body, with a focus on increasing muscle strength and endurance. The control group did not perform any exercise.

Results

The results of the study showed that the experimental group had a significant increase in muscle strength and endurance compared to the control group. The increase in muscle strength was measured using a 1RM test, and the increase in endurance was measured using a 10-minute time trial. The experimental group showed a significant increase in both measures of fitness, while the control group showed no significant change.

Conclusion

The results of this study suggest that a 12-week resistance training program can significantly improve muscle strength and endurance in young adults. This finding has important implications for the development of exercise programs for young adults, as it suggests that resistance training is an effective way to improve fitness in this population.
