

Writing Introduction: Laying the Foundations of a Research Paper

Sandeep B Bavdekar

Abstract

The Introduction section explains the rationale for undertaking the study and clearly describes the main purpose of conducting it. It should be focused, succinct and crisp. Providing an extensive and detailed literature review, not stating the hypothesis of the objectives with clarity and not providing focused information are some of the common mistakes that the authors should steer clear of.

A research study is not completed until one writes it up for a scientific journal. Once the authors choose the journal they intend to submit their manuscript to, it is time to sit down to write the manuscript itself.¹ There is no unanimity regarding the section that should be written first. Some think that it is easier to write the section on Methodology first, as one has to only edit what has been written in the protocol. Some advise writing the Conclusions first, as they think that authors will then find it easier to align the rest of the article, as per the conclusions drawn. There are still others, who prefer penning the Abstract first, as they then have to just expand the summary that has been finalized.² However, we will start the series regarding writing research article with the description of various sections of the IMRaD format (Introduction, Methodology, Result and Discussion) in the order that they appear in a manuscript.

The first section of a research article is the 'Introduction'. Almost all journals prefer to have an introduction section for the original research articles. Some journals publish a few research articles as 'Brief Reports', which may not have a designated Introduction section. The basic purpose of having an Introduction section is to "sell" the study to the editors and reviewers and to capture the attention of the readers.^{3,4} This section gradually introduces readers to the core parts and hard facts that are presented later.⁴ Annesely⁵ aptly describes it as being similar to the process of setting the scene in theatrical productions, in which a situation, scene or circumstance is described so that the audience clearly comprehends what is happening. A well-written introduction describes the background and the context, goes on to state deficiencies that exist in knowledge and understanding and then defines what is being planned thereby providing a glimpse of what to expect in the remainder of the article.⁵

Planning the Introduction

An introduction generally consists of three components. The first part provides background information, the second part justifies the need to explore the area that is not known while the third component states the hypothesis or describes the purpose and objectives of the study.^{3,6}

Background Information: This component informs the reader about the topic that is being investigated or discussed. It consists of information about what is known about the issue and provides a gist of work already carried out and reported in the literature. This can be done by providing the salient findings and conclusions of the previously published studies. Then the authors describe the unexplored areas, unanswered questions and unresolved issues of the topic. This is generally stated by referring to the paucity of literature on the issue, by providing information about conflicting research findings from various studies, limitations of the previously conducted research⁷ or by mentioning the differences of opinions among experts in the field.

Description of the rationale of the study: After having described the current situation of what is known and what is not known, the authors then proceed to convince the reader why it is important to find solutions to the unanswered questions and issues. The importance of filling these knowledge gaps is usually justified on the basis of possibility of determining a mechanism that could open the doors for

Write Introduction Research Paper:

Writing Scientific Research Articles Margaret Cargill, Patrick O'Connor, 2011-09-13 Margaret Cargill's background as a linguist and research communications educator and Patrick O'Connor's experience as both research scientist and educator synergize to improve both the science and art of scientific writing. If the authors' goal is to give scientists the tools to write and publish compelling well-documented clear narratives that convey their work honestly and in proper context, they have succeeded admirably. Veterinary Pathology July 2009. The book is clearly written, has a logical step-by-step structure, is easy to read, and contains a lot of sensible advice about how to get scientific work published in international journals. The book is a most useful addition to the literature covering scientific writing. Aquaculture International April 2009. Writing Scientific Research Articles: Strategy and Steps guides authors in how to write as well as what to write to improve their chances of having their articles accepted for publication in international peer-reviewed journals. The book is designed for scientists who use English as a first or an additional language for research students and those who teach them paper-writing skills and for early career researchers wanting to hone their skills as authors and mentors. It provides clear processes for selecting target journals and writing each section of a manuscript, starting with the results. The stepwise learning process uses practical exercises to develop writing and data presentation skills through analysis of well-written example papers. Strategies are presented for responding to referee comments as well as ideas for developing discipline-specific English language skills for manuscript writing. The book is designed for use by individuals or in a class setting. Visit the companion site at www.writeresearch.com.au for more information.
