

Balanced Report

A balanced report presents both sides of an argument and is usually made up of facts or a mix of fact and opinion. You must make sure you show there are two sides to an argument and give the reader all the information to make up their own mind. It must contain true facts and not made-up ones. Perhaps you may wish to conduct a survey or questionnaire.

- Begin with an opening statement to tell the reader what the report is about.
- Use bullet points for each new argument (this will make it easier to read).
- Use impersonal language and the present tense.
- List 'for' and 'against' arguments in separate columns.
- Write a point in favour of the argument followed by one against.
- End your report with a statement summing up both arguments or stating which argument you agree with.
- Check it through to make sure you have met all your targets and all the features are present.
