

Spotlight on How to Structure a Case Report

Ario Santini^{1*}

This is the first paper in the occasional series which aims to aid and facilitate internists and colleagues who have little or no experience in writing and submitting manuscripts for publication.

Case reports have a very low level of evidence, but they do have a place in medical publications. Polymyalgia rheumatica (PMR) was first established as a distinct disease in 1966 following the publication of a case report on 11 patients. [Davison S, Spiers H, Plotz CM "Polymyalgia rheumatica". Arthritis and Rheumatism. 9 (1): 18-23.]

■ WHAT IS A CASE REPORT?

A case report is a means of communicating something new that has been learnt from clinical practice:

- An unusual or previously unknown condition
- A rare presentation or complication of a known disease
- A new approach to managing a common condition

■ THE FIRST LINE OF EVIDENCE IN THE MEDICAL LITERATURE

The literature is reviewed to enable the authors to understand the current issues regarding the type of case they are reporting and to be able to discuss these and any developments that they consider essential. However, the structure of a Case report should not include a literature review as such, which is a distinctly separate and more extended entity.

Once the authors are familiar with currently published papers, only the most pertinent should be quoted in a Case report, usually not more than five and less than ten. (How to write a Literature Review is the subject of a future paper).

Significant value in writing a Case report is that it provides medical students and junior doctors with an excellent opportunity to develop their writing skills.

■ WHERE DOES ONE FIND CASES TO REPORT?

Look for unusual cases encountered in clinics and wards. If something interesting is found, discuss it with the consultant in charge of the case. The idea must be novel or striking about a particular patient. Consultants may have unpublished data that can be used as the subject of a case report. They would probably be delighted if for some else to write up the case.

Remember the patient is under the care of a consultant; do not proceed without obtaining the appropriate authority. Moreover, it is usual to include the consultant's name on any submitted manuscript.

A Case report comprises the following segments:

- An Abstract
- An Introduction (this will include an aim or objective and reference to pertinent published literature)
- Case presentation
- A Discussion Section [including comments on the published literature]
- A Conclusion
- References

Title and keywords will also be necessary, and these are best decided on after the major segments of the manuscript have been completed.

However, it is advisable not to write the paper in this order. The following list outlines the order that is advisable:

1. Case presentation

First, tackle the details of the case. The case presentation is a fundamental part of the case report. Describe the case in detail and chronological order. Readers should be able to determine the validity of the case and the authors' conclusions from this report.

As a general rule use simple, concise and precise sentences, avoiding any unnecessary words or phrases.
