

LESSON 6 – Principles of Speech Writing

The Speech Writing Process

Just like events planning, or any other activities, writing an effective speech follows certain steps or processes. The process for writing is not chronological or linear; rather, it is recursive. That means you have the opportunity to repeat a writing procedure indefinitely, or produce multiple drafts first before you can settle on the right one. Figure 1 shows the schematic diagram.

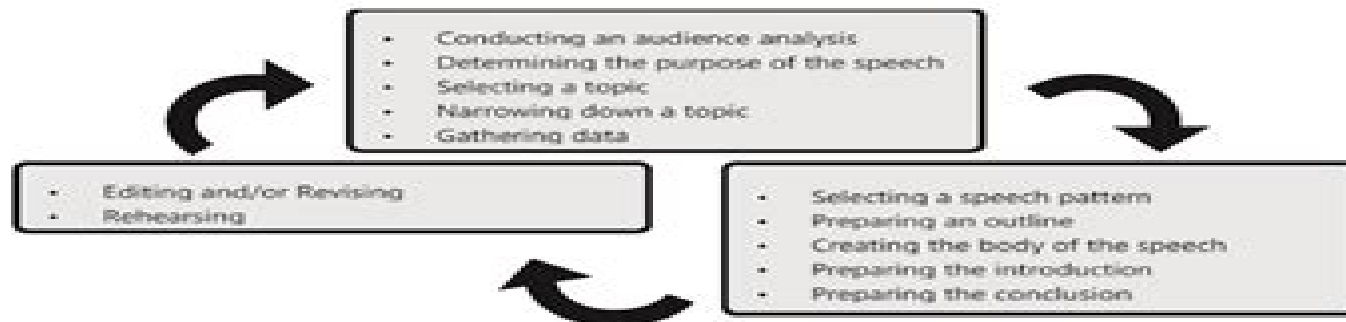

Fig. 1. Speech Writing Process

The following are the components of the speech writing process.

- Audience analysis entails looking into the profile of your target audience. This is done so you can tailor-fit your speech content and delivery to your audience. The profile includes the following information.
 - demography (age range, male-female ratio, educational background and affiliations or degree program taken, nationality, economic status, academic or corporate designations)
 - situation (time, venue, occasion, and size)
 - psychology (values, beliefs, attitudes, preferences, cultural and racial ideologies, and needs).
- The purpose for writing and delivering the speech can be classified into three—to inform, to entertain, or to persuade.
 - An informative speech provides the audience with a clear understanding of the concept or idea presented by the speaker.
 - An entertainment speech provides the audience with amusement.
 - A persuasive speech provides the audience with well-argued ideas that can influence their own beliefs and decisions.
