monetary cost and battery life In this dissertation we present Delphi a software controller for network selection on mobile devices Delphi makes intelligent network selection decisions according to current network conditions and monetary cost concerns as well as battery life considerations Our experiments show that Delphi reduces application network transfer time by 46% for web browsing and by 49% for video streaming compared with Android's default policy of always using Wi-Fi when it is available Delphi can also be configured to achieve high throughput while being energy efficient in this configuration it achieves 1.9 x the throughput of Android's default policy while only consuming 6% more energy Delphi improves performance but uses the cellular network more extensively than the status quo consuming more energy than before To address this problem we develop a general method to reduce the energy consumption of cellular interfaces on mobile devices The key idea is to use the statistics of data transfers to determine the best times at which to put the radio in different power states These techniques not only make Delphi more useful in practice but can be deployed independently without Delphi to improve energy efficiency for any cellular network enabled devices Experiments show that our techniques reduce energy consumption by 15% to 60% across various traffic patterns
