

Ocean Motions Study Guide

Surface currents usually flow more quickly than deep currents. (T)

Deep currents are caused by differences in pressure. (F; density)

The most common salt in ocean water is calcium sulfate. (F; sodium chloride)

A rip current is caused by an earthquake on the ocean floor. (F; tsunami)

The farther apart waves are, the greater their wavelength. (T)

The largest and most powerful surface current in the North Atlantic Ocean is the Gulf Stream.

The density of seawater depends on its temperature and salinity.

Oxygen in ocean water comes from the atmosphere and algae.

Gravity is the force that causes tides.

The horizontal distance between crests of waves is the wavelength.

In the Northern Hemisphere, ocean currents curve to the right because of the Coriolis effect.

Both surface currents and waves are caused mainly by winds.

As you go deeper in the ocean, pressure does NOT decrease.

Two gasses found in ocean water that are necessary for living things are oxygen and carbon dioxide.

Low tides occur about every 12 hours and 25 minutes.

A spring tide occurs when the moon, sun, and Earth are in a straight line.

The total number of high tides that occur each day in most places is two.

Tsunamis are most common in the Pacific Ocean.

The strength of a wave depends mainly on its wave height.

When a wave passes by, water particles move in a circular motion.

How do waves change as they near the shore? Explain your answer. As the water becomes more shallow, the bottoms of the waves drag on the ocean floor and slow down. This makes the wavelength decrease. The water piles up, causing the wave height to increase.

Why are large numbers of fish often found in zones of upwelling? Upwelling brings up tiny ocean organisms, minerals, and other materials from deeper layers of the water, increasing the supply of nutrients.
