How do we measure biodiversity?

Objectives

- Analyze data from four test sites.
- Infer trends in biodiversity.
- Predict what environmental factors impact biodiversity.

Process Skills

graph, model, infer, predict, draw conclusions

Time Allotment

45 minutes

Materials

pen
graph paper
ruler

colored pencils
calculator

Alternative Materials

- You might want students to graph the data using a computer and graphing program.

Preparation

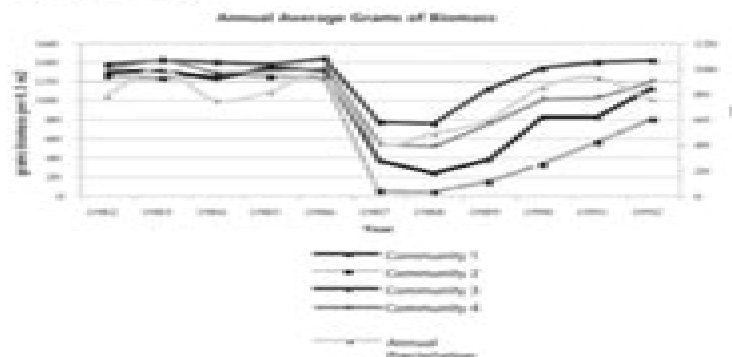

- Make sure you have enough graph paper for each student.
- Review graphing techniques with students if necessary.

Teaching the Lab

- Make sure students choose appropriate scales for their graph.
- Explain that each of the farms has been abandoned and then left undisturbed. Secondary succession is slowly returning each site to its natural habitat.
- Assist students in their understanding of how the original data was collected. The average of grams of biomass per site was determined by collecting, drying, and measuring the mass of all the plant material that could be clipped from a 0.3-m² area. The study was done over the course of 11 years at the Cedar Creek Natural History Area just north of the Minneapolis-St. Paul metropolitan area. The natural disaster of a drought during 1987–1988 provided an unusual opportunity to measure biomass effects and recovery in the area.

Data and Observations

Sample graph

Analyze and Conclude

1. Organisms will likely include field grasses (forbes or weeds), small shrubs, rodents, insects, birds, and larger animals such as coyotes.
2. Community 1 is most diverse. The data indicate that Community 1 consistently had greater biomass, and even after the drought, it was able to show the most biomass.
3. The precipitation data indicate a period of drought from approximately 1987–1988. The biodiversity in all communities decreased during this time.
4. Community 2 had the greatest change in biomass. This is probably because there is less diversity in the community. The community with the least change is Community 1. Because of its greater diversity, its overall biomass remained at more consistent levels.
5. Community 1 recovered most quickly. Community 2 recovered most slowly.
6. Inability to analyze the data presented could be a source of error.
7. It appears that the greater the diversity and the more biomass in a community, the more stable it is.

Inquiry Extensions

1. Students could cite events such as fire, flooding, or disease invasion as factors. Their predictions should show the greatest impact on and slowest recovery in Community 2. Communities with the
