

Occupational therapy research: Where do we take it from here?

The 8th European Congress in Occupational Therapy took place in Hamburg, Germany, in May 2008. In addition to the many varied lectures and workshops in diverse fields of occupational therapy (OT) practice, the congress provided opportunities to reflect on the context of OT research in Europe. One such opportunity was provided in a workshop organized by van Nes et al (van Nes et al, 2008). Following this, topics generated from the congress workshop were discussed further, to initiate a debate concerning future OT research (Brown et al, submitted). Here, the authors who were involved in this workshop outline a possible direction for future OT research efforts.

SOCIETAL CONTEXT

Research in any field is most valued when it demonstrates a positive impact on the well-being of a society at large. Therefore, the needs of our clients, as indicated by the prevalence rates of activity limitations and participation restrictions, must be important indicators that give directions for our research efforts. Therefore research should focus on the large, vulnerable and occupationally disadvantaged groups in society and the interventions they may benefit from. The European Union advocates and fosters strategies for social cohesion, indicating a large-scale political support for these aims. Thus, we should focus on changing unhealthy living situations and promoting healthy lifestyle behaviours for the disadvantaged groups in society. This aspect, the relevancy of OT research for health and well-being in society, may be viewed as our primary responsibility towards society.

DOING IT RIGHT

OT research must not be based exclusively on this 'useful for society' perspective. We must not only 'do the right thing,' but also 'do things right.' Occupational therapists need to use research approaches that fit the questions being asking and the contexts being investigating. We need to ensure that the research methods used are implemented in an appropriate manner. Research must not be limited to only one type of methodology or focus on one type of paradigm, as this also limits the knowledge generated and research findings achieved. For example, scepticism towards the use of quantitative methods in OT research, as seen in some OT milieus, has to be viewed in light of the questions we pose. This aspect, the appropriate use of various research designs and methods, may be viewed as our primary responsibility towards science.

IMPLEMENTATION

The impact of research is ultimately dependent on the extent to which research findings are implemented in clinical practice. Finding ways to bridge research and practice, for the benefit of both, should be a primary concern not only for educationists but for OT researchers in all phases of a research project (conception, conduct, and implementation). Therefore, one important aspect of OT research should be a didactic one, assisting clinicians in the interpretation of results and implementation of knowledge into practice. If European occupational therapists treated their clients using interventions based on the synthesis of the best quality knowledge available and adapted this to the regional cultural context and individual preferences, the status and recognition of our profession would continue to increase. This aspect, concerning the implementation of high quality evidence into clinical practice, may be viewed as our primary responsibility towards clinical practice.

COOPERATION

The means by which these aims can be achieved are diverse. We strongly believe that mutual support, cooperation and networking is necessary for research in our field to grow and develop. Given that the number of occupational therapists is relatively small and the number of those who are active in research is even smaller, it is essential that researchers, educators, clinicians, managers and students collaborate with each other. By working together on common projects, larger-scale and higher quality studies can be completed. Cooperation and networking can be facilitated by professional associations, special interest groups, and employers of therapists. Conferences and congresses provide excellent opportunities to make contacts and develop networks, as is using the internet. Another important means of facilitating networks is to make contributions to newsletter and journal publications. Organizations such as the Council of Occupational Therapists for the European Countries, the European Network of Occupational Therapy in Higher Education, the European Cooperation in Occupational Therapy Research and Occupational Science, the World Federation of Occupational Therapists and the various national professional associations of European countries could play key roles in facilitating this international, cross-cultural research effort.

This fourth aspect, the engagement in multi-level cooperation between researchers, academics, practitioners, students, and other allies, may be viewed as our primary responsibility towards OT research. May this continue and grow. URL
