Polders: Land from the Sea

(pages 282–283)

How did the Dutch get more land?

The Dutch needed land for their growing population. So they reclaimed land from the sea. To do this, the Dutch built dikes, earthen banks to hold back the sea. Then they drained the water off the land. Land that is reclaimed by diking and drainage is a polder.

At least 40 percent of the Netherlands was once under the sea. Because of this, much of the Netherlands is below sea level. As a result, if a dike breaks, the sea floods in and causes destruction.

The Dutch erected seaworks. These are structures that help reduce the destruction that the sea causes. The seaworks include dikes and terpen. Terpen are high earthen platforms that are safe places to go during floods and high tides.

Over the centuries, the Dutch found ways to make dikes stronger. They also learned to control water in low-lying lands. One way was to pump water from the land. In the 1400s, the Dutch added windmills to power the pumps. Today, electric motors power the pumps.

The Dutch also changed their environment by changing the Zuider Zee. This was once an arm of the North Sea. Now it is a freshwater lake. The idea was first proposed in 1667. In the 1800s and 1900s, the Dutch finally made a plan to build dikes all the way across the entrance to the Zuider Zee. The dikes stopped saltwater from flowing into that body of water. In time, it became a freshwater lake called IJsselmeer. The land around the lake was drained. This created several polders that added hundreds of square miles to the Netherlands.
