Autodesk Inventor R8 Ron Myers, 2004      Design and Control of a Camless Engine Using Linear Electromagnetic Actuators Abdelrahman Elkamhawi, Muhammad Bilal, Karam Hatem, Morne Van Heerden, 2018 This report focuses on the design fabrication testing and analysis of an open looped control system controlling valve actuation in internal combustion engines using electromechanical actuators Current internal combustion engines make use of camshafts which have limited external control and so to have a limited efficiency with respect to the total rpm range of the internal combustion engine A valve system operated electromechanically can be efficient across the entire rpm range and has the capability to be adjusted during operation Benefits of the electromechanically actuated valve system include increased power and fuel efficiency Autodesk Inventor was used in designing the mechanism and the modified engine block that was built based on dimensions of a four stroke Bajaj Pulsar 180 DTSi engine System operation was simulated using MATLAB Simscape packages and Autodesk Inventor to study and understand the system during operation The system was also analyzed in ANSYS Workbench in tandem with Autodesk Inventor was used to perform static analysis on any structural modifications to endure viability The material selected is Aluminum 356 T6 due to its properties and standardized use in manufacturing engine heads The modifications to the engine head showcased a maximum stress during operation of 1 443 MPa and a maximum displacement of 0 00194 mm which when compared to the material properties is negligible Furthermore adjustments were made to compare inventor s and workbench result due to ANSYS license limits Inventor s FEA yielded a maximum stress of 0 9028 MPa while workbench yielded a maximum stress of 0 74989 MPa with a difference of 0 15291 MPa and percentage of error of 16 94% However the minimum stress 0 MPa and 2 982 Pa from inventor and workbench respectively Similarly the maximum deformation is 0 001678 mm and 0 0016715 mm The minimum deformation is 0 mm for both programs Both of the results are within 0 6% of the ultimate stress of the material This proved the feasibility of the new design and meant that it could be implemented The system has proven its viability through maintaining valve timing and stroke and the ability to operate up an equivalent RPM of 2987 The system operates at 32 V and a maximum of 210 W which falls well within the 1000 W range of generic alternators The system maintains the ability to not only control but adjust valve timing up to an equivalent RPM of 2987 Further improvements can be made to the system through the implementation of solenoids with higher duty cycle thresholds Currently overheating remains an obstacle at higher frequencies which limits operational frequency Finally the final system cost was AED3490 just under the AED3500 UGRC budget This includes several hardware iterations and testing equipment However the lowered budget meant that a lot of virtual testing had to be done before any item was purchased ensuring the optimal use of financial resources Physical testing rigs were also constructed rather than purchased for this reason
