Abstract

Educators invest serious effort in bringing their students to adopt the notions of the 'good citizen'. Based on the growing impact of informal learning through social media, especially when asking for online help in civic education assignments, previous studies called for investigating the role of online platforms as arenas of informal civic education. This paper takes up this gauntlet, analyzing inputs of American members of the Yahoo! Answers online community in response to students' queries concerning the definition of the 'good citizen'. The results show a passive and conformist concept of the 'good citizen' that corresponds with previous studies' findings about this image in educational programs and among pre-service teachers, contrary to formal statements regarding the goal of civic education. The paper suggests that there is a feedback loop between offline and online platforms concerning the 'good citizen', which calls for the attention of educators and researchers.

Keywords: citizenship education, good citizen, social media, informal learning, computers and education

1. Introduction

The attributes and actions to be taken by the good citizen, and the role of civic education in preparing students to act accordingly are the subject of ongoing interest of policymakers, educators and researchers. Schools have been found to have direct and indirect influence on the formation of civic identity (McDevitt and Kioussis 2007) and many social education teachers see the raising of their students into active citizens as one of their prime assignments (O'Brien & Smith, 2011).

As this identity builds young adults' expectations of society and of themselves as good citizens, it influences their later political behavior and participation patterns (Thoerson, 2012). According to Pykett, Seward and Schaefer (2010), the conceptions underlying the notions of the good citizen result from the different frames held by different actors such as members of the political elite, as well as others within the community.

1.1 Key Images of the Good Citizen within the American Educational System

Looking at ten programs to advance democratic and civic education in the United States, and at the attitudes of students who participated in some of these programs, Westheimer and Kahne (2004) identified three, not mutually exclusive images that are being taught to American students as 'the kind of citizen we need to support in effective democratic society' (p. 239): the personally responsible, the participatory, and the justice-oriented citizen. According to the first image, good citizens act responsibly in their community in terms of working and paying taxes, obey the law, recycle, give blood, and volunteer to lend a hand when crisis befalls the community. The personal attributes of such a citizen are integrity, honesty, kindness, being hard working and self-reliance, all of which are necessary to 'solve social problems and improve society' (p. 240).

The second image describes a more active citizen, though the required activity is mostly limited to charity. The participatory citizen knows how government agencies operate and what the strategies for accomplishing collective tasks are, and is an active member of community organizations, contributes to efforts to care for those in need, promotes economic development or cleans up the environment. In other words, such a citizen is slightly more involved in society, and extends her/his responsibility from simply donating to a food drive (a sample action mentioned in the programs) to helping to organize a food drive. Only the third image however describes real involvement and activity. The
