Integrate technology into school curriculum-Microsoft Education

Mark East, the general manager for Global Sales and Operations at Microsoft has appealed to government to enact a policy and infrastructure for schools to access internet and technology, as a way of improving learning.

Speaking in Muyonyo during the e-Learning conference last week, East argued that every student has a right to information technology. He explained that Microsoft has been creating tailored e-learning solutions for schools across Africa for several years to address these challenges. He added that Microsoft was also considering schools that already have computers but lack access to the internet.

In Uganda, Gayaza High School is one of the beneficiaries of Microsoft's classroom initiatives. The school has adopted an inclusive approach to e-learning students can access class notes, homework and carry out research in a timely manner.
