

Next Generation Library Management Systems and Electronic Resource Acquisitions

This report summarises the discussions I had with staff from the University of Pennsylvania Library (Kuali OLE), Princeton University Library (ExLibris Alma), and The University of Tennessee at Chattanooga Library (OCLC WorldShare) about their next (or second) generation library management systems when I visited them in late August 2012 as part of the 2011 CAUL International Travelling Fellowship. This report also notes lessons that Curtin and other Australian University Libraries can learn from the experiences of these libraries.

Introduction

An investigation into the experiences of some of the early adopters of the next generation library management systems was chosen because of the work that Curtin University Library had done during 2010 and 2011 to monitor the Library System market. This research and my own experiences in working with numerous discrete systems to manage electronic resources had highlighted the need for libraries to streamline their electronic resource acquisitions processes and workflows and identified that next generation library management systems would have a big part to play in this.

Wilson (2012) gives a good summary of the five Next Generation Library Management Systems that are being developed – Alma by Ex Libris; Sierra by Innovative Interfaces, Inc.; OLE by the Kuali Foundation; WorldShare Management Services by OCLC; and Intota by Serials Solutions.

I chose to visit early adopters in the US of the three systems that had been in development for the longest period of time. This meant that I did not visit any sites that were working with Innovative Interfaces (Sierra) or Serials Solutions (Intota).

The aim of my investigation was to identify benefits of Next Generation Library Management Systems in streamlining electronic resource work processes, and to
