

Children of Divorced Parents Essay

It's important to understand that children don't want someone to rule their life. They don't want to live passively, meaning they want to have some control in shaping their future and everyday lives. It's best to encourage children to make smart decisions for themselves. The article has points stating that children like daily routines and recurrent actions. This is believed to create stability and make them feel secure about themselves. I would recommend that teachers and parents set relative standards about how and when things get done in the classroom and home.

Though set schedules are highly beneficial, children need to also have variation in their lives. This can be obtained naturally with different interactions between family members, classmates, and teachers and the demands they want. In regards to divorce, these schedules can become confusing by having them repeated in separate households. Children have to differentiate them and decide how they work together and alone. Teachers can also have similar day-to-day schedules with varying activities throughout the week to keep their students intrigued while providing stability. In a post-divorce family it's also important that parents work together to have co-existing households.

While the households don't need to be run the same way, it's important that there isn't strife between the two. A child will understand households being run differently, but a harsh and negative environment will make the child feel like they are stuck in the middle having to choose sides. Some of the more basic information stated applies to most children, but the main focus of this article is geared towards children of divorced parents. Everyone experiences things in their own way, but with a variety of families participating in this study, general ideas can be presented. The article briefly states that children of divorced parents are at risk for poor school performance in their childhood before more severe issues arise into adulthood.

Children may also develop opposing versions of themselves. Children can be largely molded depending on their environment and growing up in separate households created post-divorce may cause strife in who they think they need to be and are allowed to be. Having to live in two separate households post divorce can affect how children see themselves. Our own identity is tied to the way others see us and are emotionally connected to us. When growing up with two h
