

IGCSE History (0470)

The syllabus says that students should be taught either the 19 or 20th century Core, and at least one Depth Study. Do I have to teach all of the content of the Core and Depth Study I choose, or can I leave some of this content out?

Ideally you should cover all the content of the options you choose, but we recognise that some teachers have a limited amount of teaching time, and may find it hard to cover all this content in the time available. In that case, the decision to omit certain topics would have to be made bearing in mind the question choice offered in the examination. For the Core, you would obviously have to cover the Paper 2 topic. In addition, Section A of Paper 1 offers four questions on each of the 19th and 20th centuries, of which candidates must answer two. It follows that it would be safe enough not to teach one Key Question, and possibly two, whilst still giving students some question choice in the examination. For 20th century candidates, their four Section A questions will always be split 2/2 on the inter-war/post-war Key Questions, which means that teachers who are prepared to sacrifice question choice altogether need cover only half the Core. Cutting content on the Depth Studies is far more difficult. Here the Section B, Paper 1 question choice is only one from two, which makes it impossible to omit more than one Key Question. However, those opting for Paper 4, Alternative to Coursework, will face a single compulsory question on their Depth Study, which means that for them the only safe course is not to omit anything.

How many Depth Studies should I teach? The syllabus says at least one, but is there any advantage in doing more than one?

There is no advantage in doing more than one, and our advice would be to do just one. However, the IGCSE History syllabus aims to be flexible and to accommodate as much teacher choice as possible. When the syllabus was put together, some teachers commented that teaching just one Depth Study would, for them, make a rather narrow course. The syllabus, then, leaves the choice open. If you teach more than one, your candidates will have a greater choice of questions on Papers 1 and 4. Incidentally, we are sometimes asked if candidates may answer questions on different Depth Studies in Papers 1 and 4. The answer is, of course, yes. If you opt for coursework, your candidates can submit work on either one or two Depth Studies. To sum up, one is sufficient, but you can do more if you wish.

In Section A of Paper 1, candidates have to answer two questions. Must they choose two on the 19th century, or two on the 20th? Or can they do one from each century? I am unsure about this as the syllabus clearly states that candidates should study either the 19th or the 20th century Core.

Again, in the spirit of flexibility and choice, we permit candidates to answer any two questions in Paper 1, Section A. It is true that the syllabus states what the teaching course should be, but we know that some teachers like to 'mix and match' options in their own ways. An obvious variant on the stated Cores is to start a course with the origins of the First World War, and then to run this on to the rest of the 20th century content. Perhaps it is also worth mentioning that there is nothing to prevent teachers preparing candidates for the 20th century questions on Paper 1, but the 19th century option on Paper 2 (or vice versa).

Do I have to make a special study out of the nominated topic for Paper 2? If so, why do you have to change the topic every year, as this means we have to put together different resources each year for Paper 2, which could be quite expensive?

It is not our intention that teaching for Paper 2 should be any different from the teaching of the rest of the Core. The normal level of knowledge students should have of the Core content is more than enough for them to be able to cope with the source-based questions of Paper 2. Neither would we expect candidates to be taught sources skills only on the Paper 2 topic; rather, these
