10. The second approach to identifying and measuring the impact of a program is to use a control group. This approach involves comparing the outcomes of the program group to the outcomes of a control group that did not receive the program. The control group should be similar to the program group in all respects except for the receipt of the program. This approach is often used in randomized controlled trials, where the assignment to the program or control group is random. The control group approach is also used in non-randomized studies, where the assignment to the program or control group is based on some other factor, such as age or gender. The control group approach is a common method for evaluating the impact of a program, but it is not without its limitations. One limitation is that the control group may not be perfectly matched to the program group, which could lead to biased estimates of the program's impact. Another limitation is that the control group may not be representative of the target population, which could also lead to biased estimates of the program's impact. Despite these limitations, the control group approach remains a widely used method for evaluating the impact of a program.

- Their ventral eye (V) and dorsal eye (D) are both small, but contain sensitive photoreceptors (rhodopsin) for orientation
- Sensory processing happens in the brainstem and developed for different stimuli (e.g. motion, contrast) - changes dramatically between larval and juvenile stages - start to change to different sensory modalities
- Juvenile cephalopods are more mobile, changing orientation (e.g. from horizontal to vertical) at 40% of the time (comp. to the adults)
