Therefore, we think that the heterogeneous contribution of the agricultural to biomass carbon sequestration, if often greater than the potential of increasing soil carbon, is a promising, complementary way to enhance biomass sequestration in agroecosystems by combining various soil carbon sequestration measures and agricultural practices. Furthermore, modeling and remote sensing are used to effectively predict differences observed from this agricultural landscape and results of our assessment of sequestration in different types of agroecosystems, providing an important complementary approach to understanding and mitigating the agricultural to biomass sequestration.
