Chapter 02: Altered Cellular and Tissue Biology: Environmental Agents

Chapter Summary Review

Cellular Adaptation

1. Injury to cells and their surrounding environment, called the extracellular matrix, leads to tissue and organ injury. Cellular adaptation is an alteration that enables the cell to maintain a steady-state despite adverse conditions.
2. Atrophy is a decrease in cellular size and can affect any organ, but is most common in skeletal muscle, the heart, secondary sex organs, and the brain. The mechanisms probably include decreased protein synthesis, increased protein catabolism, or both.
3. Physiologic atrophy occurs with early development; for example, the thymus gland involutes and atrophies. Pathologic atrophy occurs as a result of decreases in workload, use, pressure, blood supply, nutrition, hormonal stimulation, and nervous stimulation.
4. Aging causes brain cells and endocrine-dependent organs, such as the gonads, to become atrophic.
5. Hypertrophy is an increase in the size of cells caused by increased work demands or hormonal stimulation. Hypertrophy can be physiologic or pathologic. Amounts of protein in the plasma membrane, endoplasmic reticulum, microfilaments, and mitochondria are increased.
6. Hyperplasia is an increase in the number of cells caused by an increased rate of cellular division. Compensatory hyperplasia enables certain organs to regenerate. Hormonal hyperplasia is stimulated by hormones to replace lost tissue or support new growth, such as during pregnancy.
7. Pathologic hyperplasia is the abnormal proliferation of normal cells in response to excessive hormonal stimulation or the effects of growth factors on target cells.
8. Dysplasia, or atypical hyperplasia, is an abnormal change in the size, shape, and organization of mature tissue cells. Importantly, the term dysplasia is not cancer and may not progress to cancer. Dysplasias that do not involve the entire thickness of the epithelium may be completely reversible.
9. Metaplasia is the reversible replacement of one mature cell type by another, sometimes less differentiated, cell type. It is found in association with tissue damage, repair, and regeneration. Metaplasia develops from a reprogramming of stem cells existing in most epithelia or of undifferentiated mesenchymal cells in connective tissue.

Cellular Injury

1. Injury to cells and to the extracellular matrix (ECM) leads to injury of tissues and organs, ultimately determining the structural patterns of disease. Injured cells may recover (reversible injury) or die (irreversible injury).
2. Cellular injury is caused by a lack of oxygen (hypoxia), free radicals, caustic or toxic chemicals, infectious agents, unintentional and intentional injury, inflammatory and
