

Tackling the AP Biology Exam – Essay Questions

If history counts for anything, one question will come from "Molecules and Cells," another question will come from "Heredity and Evolution," and two questions will come from "Organisms and Populations." Section II of the exam starts with a 10-minute reading period. Students will have an opportunity to read through the four free-response questions, which encompass broader topics than the questions in Section I, and organize their thoughts. They may use the green (lavender for Form B exams) insert for jotting down notes or making outlines. The reading period will be followed by a 90-minute period for writing the essays in the exam booklet.

At first glance, most students panic when they look at the essay questions on the test. They wonder how they are going to write four well-thought-out essays, complete with figures and graphs, in 90 minutes! They believe this must be the toughest part of the test. Well, they're wrong. Believe it or not, this is the part of the test on which you can actually shine. Why? Because you're no longer limited to multiple-choice questions where there's only one right answer. This time, you can dazzle the best reviewers with your vast knowledge of biology.

The ETS essay reviewers have a checklist of key terms and concepts that they use to assign points. Let's call these "hot" terms. Quite simply put, for each hot term that you include in your essay, you will receive a predetermined number of points. For example, if the essay question deals with the function of enzymes, the ETS graders are instructed to give 2 points for a mention of the "lock-and-key theory of enzyme specificity." Naturally, you can't just compose a "laundry list" of scientific terms. Otherwise, it wouldn't be an essay. What you can do, however, is to organize your essay around a handful of these key, or "hot," points. The most effective and efficient way to do this is by brainstorming first to come up with the scientific terms, then outlining your essay before you begin to write, using your hot terms as your guide.

Remember: (a) There are 10 minutes set aside for reading the questions, brainstorming, and outlining before you are allowed to write the essays. Be sure to read all four questions and then do Strategies 1-3 for as many questions as possible. (b) Answers must be essay form, that is, proper sentences and paragraph form with referenced diagrams in the narrative when applicable.

Strategy 1 – Read the Question Carefully

The most important advice I can give you is to read each question at least twice. As you read the question, focus on key words, especially "direction" words. Almost every essay begins with a direction word. Some examples of direction words are discuss, explain, describe, compare, and contrast. If a question asks you to discuss a particular topic, you should give a viewpoint and support it with examples. If a question asks you to compare two things, you should discuss how the two things are similar. On the other hand, if the question asks you to contrast two things, you need to show how these things are different.

Many students lose points on their essays because they either misread the question or fail to do what's asked of them. A typical error is to answer what you already know or understand instead of what is being asked.

Strategy 2 – Brainstorm

Once you've read the question, you need to brainstorm. Underline key terms that must be addressed. Jot down as many key terms and concepts – the hot terms mentioned above. Don't forget, the test reviewers assign points on the basis of these key concepts: For each one you mention and/or explain, you get a point.

How many do you need? You won't need all of them, that's for sure. However, you will need enough to get you the maximum number of points for that question. Most of these you can pull
