

Parole in New York State: the Public Calls for Major Changes

STATEMENT of Release Aging People in Prison (RAPP) FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Thursday, February 6, 2014

The public comment period on the regulations that govern parole release decisions has ended, and the community has spoken. In 100 separate comments submitted to the Board, incarcerated and formerly incarcerated people, families, civil rights and lawyers' organizations, advocates, concerned citizens, assemblymen, and former parole commissioners have said: the New York State Parole Board must begin releasing people for whom further incarceration serves no purpose.

In December 2013, the Parole Board rewrote some of its regulations governing the way release decisions are made. Unfortunately, the new regulations create no basis for change. Assemblyman Daniel O'Donnell, Chair of Committee on Corrections and Assemblyman Kenneth Zebrowski, Chair of Administrative Regulations Review Commission, write in their comment that they are "extremely disappointed [with the regulations]; they fail to achieve any change in the status quo, much less the significant change we envisioned at the time we negotiated the amendments."

Instead, as explained in comments by the Center for Constitutional Rights, the regulations allow the Board to continue ignoring parole applicants' readiness for release: "The Board regularly fails to release people who are "low risk" to society according to evidence-based assessment scores; who have demonstrated their rehabilitation; who have participated in release programs and other institutional endeavors; who have well-prepared release plans; and who are elderly."
