ABSTRACT

Billions of gallons of water are used annually to flush toilets in the United States. Consequences of this usage include consumption of natural resources and construction of new infrastructure to treat and transmit potable water and wastewater. Waterless, or no-flush urinals, may help mitigate these effects and offer other advantages, including lower utility charges, improved restroom hygiene, and decreased fixture maintenance. Some notable caveats include possible lack of acceptance by users, odor control problems, and rejection by code officials.

As urine is about 96% liquid, no additional water is really needed to wash it down the drain. The waterless, urinal, looking much like its conventional counterpart, takes advantage of this concept with generally positive results.

This paper will discuss the design, applications, operation, maintenance, advantages, and disadvantages of waterless urinals. The results of two surveys of current users will be shared. A case study from a Texas school district will be also presented.

DESIGN AND OPERATION

The waterless urinal appears and works like a conventional urinal, except that it does not flush and, therefore, requires no water. Like their traditional counterparts, waterless urinals are made of fiberglass or vitreous china, and are offered in white as well as various custom colors (Figure 1). ADA compliant models are also available. No-flush urinals can be installed virtually anywhere the conventional variety would be used.

Like ordinary urinals, waterless types are plumbed to a standard drain line, but obviously do not use a conventional water-filled trap. Waterless urinals utilize proprietary sealant liquids that act as a vapor trap. The liquids are composed primarily of natural oils that are lighter than water. Urine passes through this liquid and goes down the drain. The sealant liquid, except a minuscule amount that escapes with each use, remains in place to trap odors and prevent them from escaping into the restroom.

The various manufacturers of waterless urinals available in the U.S. use three types of drain trap designs. Two companies utilize a removable, recyclable plastic cartridge that is inserted into the fixture's drain hole. A typical design is shown in Figure 2, although they vary somewhat by manufacturer. Another maker employs an integral ceramic siphon that is cast into the urinal, and the last utilizes a built-in waste trap housed in the fixture drain. In all cases, whether removable or not, the drain trap is designed to contain the sealant liquid.

The removable cartridge, according to manufacturers' literature, serves two other purposes in addition to holding the sealant liquid. First, it acts as a strainer to keep unwanted materials such as
