

Qualified audit reports

by John Wyatt

01 Nov 2000

The purpose of this article is to explain the structure of the basic form of audit report and to describe the various forms of qualified audit reports and the situations which could lead to their use. Please note that for study purposes it is pointless trying to memorise the exact wording of these reports, instead concentrate upon the structure of the report and how this may change when a qualification is in prospect.

The elements of an audit report

These are as follows:

1 Title: the report is addressed to the members of the company, remember that the auditor is under a statutory duty to report to the members of the company.

2 Scope: The purpose of this paragraph is to ensure that the elements of the financial statements which are subject to audit are identified (by reference to the relevant page numbers in the annual report). This is important to avoid misunderstandings in relation to the auditor's opinion. An element of the so-called "expectation gap" which is claimed to exist between users of financial statements and auditors is the perception on the part of some users that the entire contents of the annual report are subject to audit so identifying the scope of the audit is crucial.

The following financial statements are subject to audit.

- The Balance Sheet.
- The Profit and Loss Account.
- The Cash Flow Statement.
- The Statement of Total Recognised Gains and Losses (STRGL).

Note that company law requires the first two of the above list to be audited whereas the auditor needs to audit the cash flow statement and STRGL because these have to be produced to comply with FRS1 and FRS3 respectively, and compliance with accounting standards is now an accepted part of achieving a "true and fair view." In addition, the auditors should disclose the details of directors' remuneration and details of any transactions between a company and its directors or officers if the company has not given the required disclosures in the notes to its financial statements as required by company law.

Note that the auditor is also under a statutory duty to consider if:

- proper accounting records have been kept;
