Organic Molecules Lab

Introduction: Organic molecules are the chemicals that sustain biological processes in all living things. These compounds are always made up of more than one type of element and must be synthesized by living organisms.

What makes an organic molecule different from an inorganic molecule is that organic molecules MUST contain carbon-hydrogen bonds, whereas inorganic molecules do not.

The four major types of organic molecules are carbohydrates, lipids, proteins, and nucleic acids. In this lab you will construct and study carbohydrates, lipids and amino acids (which are the building blocks of protein).

Materials: Model building set:

- White plastic tubes = covalent bonds
- H (Hydrogen) = white spheres
- O (Oxygen) = blue spheres
- N (Nitrogen) = red spheres
- C (Carbon) = black spheres

Procedure: Follow the steps outlined for each type of molecule below and answer the questions associated with each molecule.

Molecule # 1 Water (H_2O) ~ An INORGANIC molecule necessary for life.

- Use the modeling kit to build a molecule of water.
- Draw a colored picture of the water molecule in the space provided below.

QUESTIONS:

1. What elements (atoms) make up a molecule of water?
2. What do the white straws represent in the model?
3. In the formula for water, what does the small 2 (subscript) following the H mean?
4. In the formula for water, why is there no subscript following the O?
5. Even though water contains two of the elements found in organic compounds why isn't it considered to be an organic compound?
6. What is the ratio of hydrogen to oxygen in a water molecule?
