As a laboratory-based test of other, ethically-infeasible feeding trials, pre-pilot studies suggest this device could have been used to evaluate interventions during pre-pilot feeding responses in a controlled environment. In theory, controlled environments could permit researchers to identify individual children, some of whom may have been at risk for SCD. This presents the potential for confounding, however, as other potential factors are not controlled. Furthermore, previous data on feeding responses in the laboratory setting suggest that individual differences in feeding responses may be related to individual differences in feeding responses in the laboratory setting.
