

The Path to Violence: Understanding the Problem of School Shootings

The April 1999 school shooting at Columbine High School in Colorado transformed how the United States of America perceives bullying, violence, gun rights and the threat of a school attack. While such school shootings are rare, according to Burtol & Burtol (2017), reporting on school shootings has increased while the actual number of such events has not really changed. While a more long-term effect has been the emergence of The Safe School Initiative as a tool to assist schools in preventing such violence, the immediate impact of the events at Columbine were misinterpretations of who commits these types of acts, and why they commit them. Correcting the misunderstandings and myths about school attacks is only the first step in creating a safer school environment and providing the necessary mental health care that the attackers need.

1. One of the biggest myths about school shootings is the perception that there is an epidemic in the United States (Kieckhaefer, 2018). While it is true that the United States has had a majority of these tragedies, there have only been 25 school shootings investigated by the FBI between 1999 and 2013 (Burtol & Burtol, 2017). Other common myths concern the type of individuals likely to commit these attacks. As will be discussed later, there is no single useful profile of a school shooter. Attackers are not always loners, they are not always motivated by revenge, and they are not always committed by outsiders or antisocial individuals. While having access to weapons is a risk factor, it is not the most important in determining who is likely to be a school shooter. Despite the variety of perpetrators, there are some commonly shared psychological traits between those who commit these violent acts.

The most common traits between school shooters are feelings of depression, and ostracization from the social group. These individuals are victims of bullying, without a social support group or other mitigating factors (Kieckhaefer, 2018; Burtol & Burtol, 2017). Frequently, those who engage in school attacks have a history of animal cruelty, especially pet abuse, and generally have a fascination with morbidity and death. According to Burtol & Burtol (2017), they may also have an interest in acquiring and using weaponry, and in many cases, they are suicidal. Finally, many school shooters leave hints or outright inform others of their intentions to commit violent acts. Unfortunately they are often further bullied or even encouraged to escalate their plans by their peers, rather than prevented from acting.

2. The opening segment of the 2013 PBS documentary After Newtown: The Path to Violence (2013) focuses on a near-tragedy in Roy, UT, prevented only by a student's decision to inform staff of the impending attack (Slobogin, Lindsay, Nutting & Rosenbaum, 2013). Megan Wehrman, a student, began receiving text messages from an unnamed friend who was plotting to do something terrible at Roy Hi
