Abstract

Women with problematic substance use are frequently referred to interventions to promote positive parenting. Parenting interventions that attend to the unique risks faced by this population may enhance engagement and outcomes. While reviews of extant parenting interventions in the research literature have been undertaken, no studies have examined parenting interventions being implemented in community practice and the extent to which these are informed by current research. We systematically compared parenting interventions offered in 12 maternal substance use treatment programs in one Canadian province with those described in the research literature ($K = 21$). Few parenting interventions were replicated, either within or across the two samples. However, parenting interventions within both samples were largely similar in their objectives. Across both research and community samples, approximately half of the interventions were developed or adapted for a problematic substance use population. Parenting knowledge, psychosocial risk, and maternal emotional regulation were most commonly addressed. Risks pertaining to the impact of drug craving and substance-related changes in neurobiology associated with parenting were less commonly addressed. Findings highlight current strengths and limitations of parenting interventions within research and community settings, with recommendations offered for future research and knowledge translation.

In the United States, approximately 12.5% of children under the age of 6 years live with an adult with a substance use disorder (SAMHSA, 2017). In substance use treatment programs, more than two thirds of women identify as being mothers (Brady & Audley, 2005). Gender and the motherhood role are critical to consider in the context of substance use treatment. Women are less likely to engage in substance use treatment than men (Greenfield et al., 2007). However, becoming a parent and a desire to care for their child and maintain custody can motivate women to seek treatment (Sword et al., 2009; Sword, Niccols, & Fan, 2004). Given this, the parenting role may open a window of opportunity for substance use treatment providers to engage with women experiencing problematic substance use and to support them in promoting their health and well-being as well as that of their child.

Integrated treatment programs have been developed to comprehensively address the needs of women who are parenting in the context of problematic substance use. While varied in terms of specific services offered, these programs aim to provide women and their children with comprehensive and coordinated support to address maternal substance use and well-being, parenting, and child well-being often at a single location (Milligan et al., 2010). Importantly, they also address frequently occurring barriers to intervention, including fear of child welfare involvement (Andrews, Mott, Pepler, Joong, & Khoury,
